Legal Update: High-Risk Vehicle Stops

This training bulletin provides an overview of Chinaryan v. City of Los Angeles, a Ninth Circuit opinion¹ that eliminates qualified immunity for an officer who uses high-risk tactics during a vehicle stop based solely on reasonable suspicion that the vehicle is stolen. The court defined a "high-risk vehicle stop" as an investigatory stop that included officers drawing and holding weapons in a low ready position and placing suspects in a prone position.

This case does not preclude law enforcement officers from using high-risk tactics during a vehicle stop. It simply requires something more than suspicion that a vehicle has been stolen or cold-plated to justify the use of such tactics.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND:

Chinaryan was driving home in her husband's 2018 black Chevrolet Suburban limousine when an LAPD sergeant saw her and mistakenly suspected the vehicle to be stolen. A 2015 black Chevrolet Suburban limousine had been stolen a few days prior and its LoJack signal detected less than half a mile from where Chinaryan was spotted. The sergeant radioed a request for DMV information and learned that the license plate belonged to a Dodge Ram which had not been reported stolen. Believing the vehicle to be "cold-plated," he called for backup. He followed the Suburban for about 10 minutes, during which time the driver did not exceed the speed limit, drive evasively, or violate any traffic laws.

Although it was daytime, the vehicle's heavily tinted windows made it difficult for officers to determine how many individuals were in the car. Only two individuals were visible through the front windshield. The LoJack receiver did not register a signal during this time, but officers reasoned that LoJack systems can be disabled. Approximately a dozen officers and a helicopter unit were following the vehicle when it pulled over. Several officers had their firearms pointed at or near Chinaryan in a low-ready position as she was ordered to turn off the vehicle, throw her keys outside, step out, and keep her hands up. She was instructed to walk away from the vehicle and lie down on her stomach in the street. She was on the ground for three minutes while officers cleared the car, after which they holstered their weapons and handcuffed her. Chinaryan's two passengers, one of whom was her teenage daughter, were also ordered out of the vehicle at

If deputies do not have justification to conduct a high-risk stop, they may still conduct an investigative stop and direct the occupants out of the vehicle.

Deputy safety comes first. Deputies should continue to respond as the situation calls for and make sure to document the incident in detail. Use of Force Guidelines are located in Section 11 of the San Diego Sheriff's Office's Policy and Procedure.
